Anura Saparamadu and his love for VINTAGE POSTERS

"Posters in the present age are all photo shopped and can be created in no time and therefore have no value in them, but the posters that I collect have a lot of effort put into them and therefore the value of them is great"

ANURA

6 years ago Anura Saparamadu found a poster of a Kandyan dancer which was painted in the year 1948 and was instantly drawn towards the beauty of it purely because it was hand painted and it had something quite eye-catching hidden in it.

Today Anura is the proud owner of over 300 posters which are connected to Sri Lanka in some manner ranging from movies that were shot in our wonderful little island paradise to posters that showcase Sri Lanka as a travel destination and mind you, all these posters were drawn before 1979!

Anura says that he buys his posters from dealers on the internet and posters cost from 2- 300 dollars but stresses on the fact that it is money worth spending. Anura also goes on to add that he finds a new poster every 3-4 months and also adds that sometimes people try to sell him posters that he already has.

"Posters in the present age are all photo shopped and can be created in no time and therefore have no value in them, but the posters that I collect have a lot of effort put into them and therefore the value of them is great" says Anura.

Anura says many people are interested in his hobby and want to purchase re-prints of the posters that he has and adds that some very famous cafes and stores have purchased these posters because it adds to the ambience of the venue.
